his story told in this very satisfying book. Not a straight romance by any means, there is plenty of intrigue and excitement to entertain the most distractable of readers. Trace, at odds with his family for a dozen years now and tired of his world-travels and work as a spy, is ready to throw in the towel when he is sought out by Dr. Gillian Fitzpatrick, a scientist whose brother and niece have been kidnapped by a radical terrorist group. He agrees (for a large sum of money) to help Gillian recover her family, but underestimates the bond that he quickly forms with her. Believing for so long that he is not meant to love or be loved, Trace is reluctant to give his heart to someone and even more reluctant to let anyone love him, lest he hurt them the way he did his family. The terrorist kidnapping plot certainly moves this story along, although some of the details were a bit too easily resolved once the final confrontation is in place. The romance was extremely well-written and believable, and things did not just neatly "fall into place" there -- you knew they would wind up together but it wasn't overly convenient for them to get there, just like real life! The reunion of the O'Hurley's after all is said and done really provides a satisfying end to the "quadrilogy".

It was by far the best out of the series, not only because of the action and intrigue, but because it reunites the O'Hurley family. Gillian and Trace are a phenomenal couple, perfect for each other. We're updated on the lives of Abigail and Dylan, Maddy and Reed, and witness the wedding of Chantal and Quinn. The conflict between Trace and his father has gone on for years and is really heartbreaking, but, man, what a tearjerker of a reunion they have at the end. Trust me, this is the best O'Hurley book and one of the best books I've ever read. You'll love it!
